 Re: WA-03 Poll Results
 Date: June 20, 2018

Our recent survey of likely November 2018 general election voters in Washington's 3rd Congressional District shows incumbent Republican Jaime Herrera Beutler much more vulnerable than she has been in previous election cycles.¹ As the race stands today, Democrat Carolyn Long is only 5 points behind Herrera Beutler.

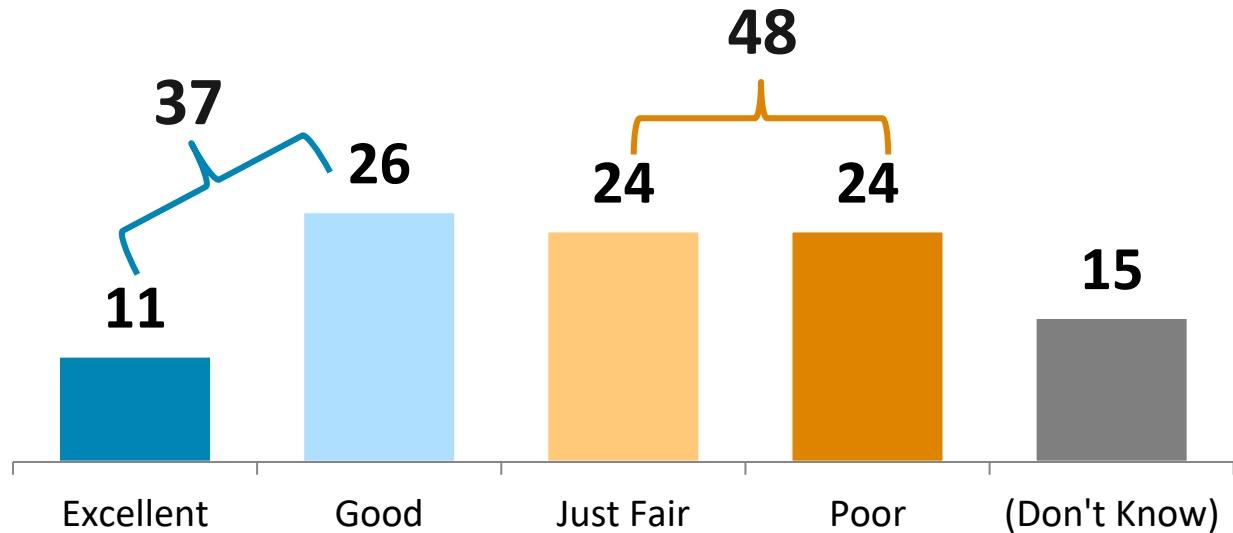

The gap between the two candidates closes very quickly, with the race tied after voters hear positive profiles of both candidates. On the informed ballot, independent voters support Long by a 15-point margin, with Long leading Herrera Beutler 45% to 30%.

¹ Lake Research Partners conducted a live telephone survey among 500 likely November 2018 general election voters in Washington's 3rd Congressional District. The survey was conducted June 14-18, 2018 and has a margin of error of +/-4.4%.

Herrera Beutler is vulnerable in this district, with her job performance underwater by 11 points. Just 37% of voters say she is doing an excellent or good job, compared to 48% who say she is doing a just fair or poor job. Further, a majority of independents (50%) say she is doing a just fair or poor job.

Herrera Beutler Job Performance

With enough resources to communicate her message, Long is in a strong position to compete and win in a very competitive district.
